COVER ILLUSTRATION: At a time when the nation pauses to consider the ambiguities and ironies of the recent Persian Gulf War, it seems appropriate to consider popular attitudes toward the American soldier in another era. The motivations and behavior of the enlistee, historian Dale R. Steinhauer reminds us, mirror the way the nation and its political leaders regard its "citizen army." Political considerations fashion popular attitudes toward the military, and these in turn shape the soldiers' self-image. Antebellum attitudes toward the peacetime army implicitly encouraged desertion, and rewards such as those offered in this 1847 Bangor Whig and Courier advertisement failed to stem the tide.
